

The Island Trail: A Lost Voyage

— Summer, 1976

You and your partner have been enjoying a peaceful Southern California getaway—sailing the coast, fishing in quiet coves, and soaking in the freedom of life at sea aboard a modest yacht borrowed from a friend.

Early this morning, you set out for a short fishing trip before breakfast. Just a few hours offshore. But without warning, a violent, unseasonal storm rolled in. Winds howled. Waves crashed over the bow. The sky turned dark. Your engine gave out. The radio went silent.

When the chaos finally cleared, you were adrift—battered, disoriented, and far from any place you recognize.

Now, you find yourselves washed ashore on a rocky stretch of coast. No working equipment. No way to call for help. And no idea where you've landed.

As you scan your surroundings, something catches your eye—a splintered pier reaching out into the shallow surf. At its far end sits a rundown building, sun-bleached and half-sagging, with a rusted sign that reads:

TWO HARBORS VISITOR SERVICES

The front door creaks slightly in the breeze. It's ajar.

Your Objective:

Follow the trail. Piece together the clues. Find your way across the island and escape—before the sun sets and you're stranded for good.

Begin your journey by entering the shop and opening Clue 1.

Note:

obtain any hiking/biking/camping permits & gear haul you may need before opening
